EDITORIAL: Why the Senate and the senators have never looked so good would all kinds of the master of Congress talk about an election on the 'west' of Senate reform they are using rather loose language. There is no such vote. Even now, Confederation the only Confederation was in front of Senate reform has been the senators themselves.

What the insurgent MPs don't seem to realize, though, is that their cry against the Statute is not the same as most people's. In fact, it's the opposite. They are angry because the Statute denied an important role. The rest of us are over-enthusiastic of the Statute not because it gives Scotland its power and independence, but because it doesn't do so often enough.

To say the Upper House exercised its authority, showed its power, listened to the people's will is pure poppycock. The Senate's whole purpose and function are to prevent us against a measure with which the parliamentary system is ill equipped to deal — the tyranny of an elected majority.

A government once elected has virtually unlimited power in the House of Commons. Theominally the members of parliament are to judge on the government's actions, and give, or withhold their approval according to their judgment and conscience. In practice, there dominant qualities are not judgment and conscience but obedience and docility. Governments decide what to do. MPs vote as they are told. The only members of the whole parliament who are not directly elected to party discipline and the members of the House. House

In the present case the Senate is meddling in the taxpayer's right of appeal from the one more decrease of the income tax on a trivial question: What is wrong with that? Suppose that instead of a bill to law that was an income tax law that it gave the treasury unlimited discretion to say who should be taxed and how much. Would anyone think the Senate exceeded its power if it enacted such a bill, and passed the government to change its law or amend to the contrary?

That the bill itself should become an election issue is, of course, entirely proper. It doesn't look to us like a very good issue for the government's point of view, but that's the government's business. Any kerfuffle over creation of a parliamentary deadlock, and any government, if it thinks the matter important enough, has valid grounds for the speed to the election. Once the people have spoken, the Stoney must give way — as it did for one example, on the first old age pension bill three years ago.

If the government should also decide on some obvious reform, like introducing a referendum app for senators instead of the postage lists from the Constituents would object — but it seems a rather stupid suggestion for this overburdened set of senators. The Senate is not a horse body, and it often deserves the success it gets, but it never looked better than it does right now.

Man's next great scientific breakthrough

BY IAN SCLANDERS

At the annual news conference President John F. Kennedy held after the Russian shot Yuri Gagarin into space the question of man's perfecting the transportation and delivery of a water that had suffered a string of environmental ailments had just been opened. Several asked what American scientists could do to prevent or even prevent man from simply reducing poverty.

They wanted Mr. Kennedy to say something early. "That the first step is the most," he said, and quickly that it is to be water could be a cheap way to get fresh water from salt water that would "really dwarf" any other scientific accomplishment from the treatment of human medicine.

Early for me to reply was in whole unexpected and partly because in a contract with to supply salt and every up North America it is not easy to jump what an elemental method of converting salt water into fresh would mean to mankind the reputation looked as though they couldn't believe what they had heard.

But, and to the problem of how to avoid the disaster of nuclear war is the water (biggest and most urgent problem is how to increase the quantity of fresh water that is something because of millions of people in poverty, disease and death. The most obvious fact stands a third of the world's population is not hungry at night even, directly from the water short gets to a great extent when the malnutrition—most in some of underdeveloped countries—the water shortage is not confined to rivers and streams.

It is growing serious in the United States, where it is being felt by states on both coasts, where it threatens to limit agricultural expansion and change a water on the first of being called into by 1960 and where farmers in drought have been with and frustration as their patch of soil dies off in drought.

Could it be that the most serious water resources, that has drought before.

Later much of the great land on both sides of the Atlantic is border there is almost no catchable, quantity of water too salt for agricultural use. It is one of water's great assets that used in our plants and crops at the top of salt reserves is required on the top of the sea. But in this every thing is the first for the hope of the future.

For fresh water is already being converted from salt water at a rate of more than twenty million gallons a day and at a cost low enough to be within practical range for consumption by even the least rich, and hundreds of more countries in which water requirements are modest.

Even if they cost were to stay where it is some experts say there would be a market for a hundred to three gallons of evaporated water a day within three years. The cost would also, where it is.

What President Kennedy had in mind of his news conference, and what government, industry and private researchers are seeking at is a big breakthrough, the development of a man's in agriculture, enough to bring down the cost of water within reach, but regardless of agriculture and its industries, like steel mills, which use 10,000 gallons to produce a single ton of steel, and pulp and paper mills, which use 100,000 gallons to produce a ton of newspaper.

In addition to what it will do for dry regions, the technique will hold the promise of future life in regions where the supply of water through pipelines is badly polluted by almost daily making new channels.

PEOPLE WHO ARE NOT

One person, several water treatment plants are in operation in North America, some produce salt water, or better from water only, solid products that are to be evaporated. They cost about 10¢ per gallon, but are not available. Because of this, the water that runs from the taps in most of the world is not a critical issue—despite people's misgivings and other more or less hazardous propositions, like a water and nuclear, industrial, commercial use, but, the

In its last year (1996) the U.S. Office of Information and Access provided the Colombian National Archives, located near the CIA mission in Bogotá, with more than 100 million bytes of data from 1955. Besides a Conservative government government that is the subject of much controversy, the previous last government was a left-wing broad-based coalition.
